Next term with Ciné Schools, Film Academies across the country will be producing short films that adapt literature into screen stories. Popular books read in class or at home will be reimagined by students as films, developing a deep understanding of narrative, character and theme through the act of making. These films will be screened nationally and introduced by Andrea Gibb, writer of the adapted screenplay for Swallows and Amazons, giving students a rare and inspiring link between the books they love and the professional world of filmmaking.

We are keen for this work to actively support learning in schools. If your Head of English has texts or themes they would like explored, we will happily steer projects to align with your curriculum and reading priorities. This is a pioneering term and a key part of our national bid to position filmmaking as a practical classroom tool that strengthens engagement and improves knowledge retention. By taking part, your school is not on the sidelines, you are right at the forefront of shaping how creative storytelling and academic learning can work together in a meaningful, modern way.
